Spartanburg High School launches all-new Viking News broadcast

Spartanburg High School's all-new Viking News broadcast launched this year and is receiving rave reviews for its first two episodes. It was conceived by art and photography teacher Crissy Rennie, who is in her third year at SHS, as a way to boost school spirit and help students develop valuable skills.

The Viking News team started small with their first episode but attracted interest and grew to include more students for its second episode, released in October. The crew meets to plan each episode before school once per month, then heads out to capture the stories.

Spartanburg Regional's Child Development Program celebrates 50 years

Between laying a foundation of learning and growth in infants to age 12 and providing an invaluable service to associates across Spartanburg Regional – the Ida Thompson Child Development Program recently celebrated its 50th year in operation.

Families who have enrolled in the program over the years celebrated an anniversary by sharing testimonies and photos of their experiences.

The Child Development Program offers Spartanburg Regional associates a high-quality childcare and early education environment to meet their childcare needs and invest in their children from an early age.

This valuable resource associates, supports enhances the hospital's appeal in recruiting efforts, creates a positive work culture and makes Spartanburg Regional an employer of choice.

"As we celebrate this milestone, we also want to renew our commitment to continue providing exceptional care and education for the next generation," said Darla Pennington, Spartanburg Regional's liaison to the program.

Results from a 2024 parent survey showed that parents gave a 99% overall satisfaction rating in the care and education their children receive.

The survey also revealed:

• A 95% satisfaction with health and safety measures.

• A 100% satisfaction with the comprehensive developmental experiences.

• A 98% satisfaction with the skills and knowledge children receive to help them succeed.

A history of service

An associate survey in 1971 first revealed a genuine and present need for childcare across the Spartanburg Regional system.

Then, in 1974, that need was met when the Child Development Program opened its doors under the direction of Patricia C. I know he has a place to be Horizons, a third-party provider, operates the program and works under the direction of Spartanburg Regional. Bright Horizons is a national company that partners with employers to give working families the support they need.

The program thrives today because of the hard work, dedication and commitment of Spartanburg Regional associates, families, staff and community members.

Challenges throughout the years, such as a flood in 1987 and the 2020 COVID-19 pandemic, highlighted how the commitment of those involved shone in the face of adversity to ensure that associates still had a steady learning environment for their children.

"We have been able to withstand challenges and adapt to educational changes like hands-on learning, new methodologies and new research throughout the decades," Pennington said. "We have witnessed generations grow, develop and achieve their potential, thanks to the care and education they received here."

The program's 50-year mark represents layers of commitment and dedication.

The anniversary represents:

- A demonstration of support to countless families by caring for their children in a clean, safe environment close to work.
- An opportunity to celebrate the positive contributions made to the growth and development of these children.
- A testament to the hard work and dedication of the educators, staff and supporters.

A gift to families

As a retention tool, the program has attracted top talent to the healthcare system and made it easier for parents to balance their work-life responsibilities.

"Some days I have to be at work at six," says Lainey Donnan, a surgical technician at SRHS, who likes being able to drop off her son and still get to work on time. "If I get held up at work or if I'm on call, that is safe for him, that they have extended hours where most daycares you have to pick up by five." The program operates in a building at the Spartanburg Medical Center campus and is open from 6 a.m. to 8 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Through the years, families have known convenient and quality care environment close to their workplace. This convenience has reduced commute times for associates and reduced the stresses of pick-up and drop-off procedures.

"The center also creates a sense of community among associates with opportunities to network and share experiences," Pennington said.

Ysabel Reid, a nursing clinical educator, has had two daughters in the Child Development Program and said the support has brought her such peace of mind.

"Not only are the hours conducive for clinical staff, but their location is also convenient and feels like a family environment," Reid said. "I sincerely appreciate that the staff have cared for my kids as if they were their own. The life skills and education they've received have helped them transition independently and successfully into their school settings and I could not be more grateful."

Hub City is the primary and most utilized nickname for Spartanburg. The reason Spartanburg was nicknamed Hub City is directly tied to the rail industry and the importance it played for Spartanburg as a community.

The best way to explain the organization's #1 reason is to answer the question, "What is a Spartanburger?". Similar to someone from Texas calling themselves a Texan or someone from New York saying they are a New Yorker, a person that calls Spartanburg home is a Spartanburger, and a group of people from Spartanburg are Spartanburgers.

USC planning South Carolina's first hospital specializing in neurological care

By Jeff Stensland

The University of South Carolina is planning to develop a unique hospital that would house the Palmetto State's first standalone comprehensive medical facility dedicated entirely to integrated care of patients with brain and nervous system illnesses.

USC's highly specialized hospital would offer advanced neurological and neurosurgery treatments, as well as neurological rehabilitation for trauma, stroke, cancer and other conditions. The innovative hospital, concentrating solely on the care of diseases affecting the brain and the nervous system, would be the first of its kind in the Southeast.

The hospital would provide an opportunity to address the pressing health needs of South Carolinians, while leveraging the broad multidisciplinary clinical, academic and research portfolio from USC. The hospital would house fully equipped clinical research spaces and laboratories and provide additional clinical training sites for USC students studying medicine, physical and speech therapy, nursing, pharmacy, artificial intelligence, biomedical engineering, and other academic, medical and technical disciplines.

The hospital would have about 115 beds that provide access to state-of-theart health care from preeminent physicians, therapists and nurses.

"As USC expands its efforts to provide the highest quality medical education to South Carolina students and serve the state's health care needs, building a single location for neurological treatment and rehabilitation is a vital next step," President Michael D. Amiridis said. "This is a tremendous opportunity to address a critical gap in health care for brain-related conditions, not only for our state, but for the entire Southeast."

The need for enhanced neurological care in South Carolina is critical. Stroke, caused by a disruption of blood flow to the brain, is the sixth-highest cause of death in the state, according to the S.C. Department of Public Health. South Carolina also ranks fourth for death rates due to traumatic brain injuries, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention has reported.

Increasing numbers of South Carolinians also are suffering from other chronic neurological conditions that can be mitigated through treatment and rehabilitation, including epilepsy and Alzheimer's disease and other types of dementia.

Current neurological care and rehabilitation options in South Carolina are limited, forcing residents to seek care outside the state. The time and travel expenses required by patients and families can be overwhelming and can impact health outcomes. The planned USC hospital would make world-class treatment available right in the heart of South Carolina, while reducing costs for patients.

next to the university's soon-to-be-constructed School of Medicine building on USC's Health Sciences Campus inside the BullStreet District of Columbia. It would be an extension of the university's network of cuttingedge brain health care and research. USC is already establishing the Brain Health Center, a high-tech outpatient treatment and research facility near the BullStreet site. In addition,

through clinics in USC's

Brain Health Network,

patients in underserved areas across the state are receiving diagnostic care and treatment for complex neurological conditions and dementia.

"This would be the most impactful project in the history of the university, particularly for the quality of life of South Carolin-ians," USC Board of Trustees Chairman Thad Westbook said. "Our citizens would be able to get the best quality of care in their backyard. This is all part of our mission in serving the people of South Carolina. We do that through the delivery and development of knowledge, and here's an opportunity for us to help deliver healthcare at the highest level for brain health issues, which desperately need more attention in our state."

The hospital would complement USC's long-standing partnership with Prisma Health by extending the collaboration at the McCausland Center for Brain Imaging and Brain Health Network, and in training medical students.

USC is coordinating plans for the hospital with the S.C. Department of Health and Human Services. The USC Board of Trustees approved an agreement with the state health agency on Oct. 25 to receive $10 million to perform preliminary architecture and engineering work.

The university is requesting $150 million from the state budget next year to help pay for the $350 million project.
